

Welcome to Company Law Forum

Contributed by David Williams
Monday, 19 November 2007

Over the past 12 months we have been listening to our customers' worries about the effects of the Companies Act on their businesses. In response, we've developed a unique website to help business leaders and their advisers grapple with the reforms and reach a better understanding of how the changes impact in practice.

We are proud of the fact that we were able to launch Company Law Forum just one week after the announcement that many of the Act's October 2008 commencements are to be delayed until late 2009 – and this is one of the many subjects users will be discussing.

What Company Law Forum gives you:

Company Law Forum provides an environment for the legal and business community to share thoughts, useful links, and have discussions and network on company law related issues. This site is free to access will include:

- Share ideas, publish opinions and thoughts and discuss issues and topics that are current in company law

- A directory of registered users which allows you to contact other members privately

- News and current awareness headline feeds

- External current awareness brought into the site to add further

value and context to the site

The content on the site is free. To contribute you must register to but this is just a simple sign-in.

The idea of the forum is that it runs and polices itself, generating new ideas, new groups and all the content. Therefore, please help us facilitate the site by reporting any abuse you see and sending us your ideas and feedback.

LexisNexis sponsors this site and provides basic moderation, basic technical support and some free content.

Company Law Forum will, with your contributions, become a vigorous, independent and constantly evolving place for everyone with an interest in company law to meet and exchange views and ideas.